

(Warning: This story contains female muscle growth, graphic sexual content, and taboo elements)

Note: So this story is 'different' than usual. In the sense that the commissioner saw that other Monthly Request I wrote, Nurse of Steel, and wanted it adapted into a taboo story. So, for that reason, the character of FGO's Nightingale is interpreted here not in the game's setting, but as an isolated setting that will also take fantastical elements. Think of the design of the character integrated here in its own standalone thing to fit with the commissioner's request.)

X~X~X~X~X

The war had been going on even before Joshua's birth. Joshua heard vague things about how it started; nobody was sure anymore. The only certainty was the front lines, the No Man's Lands that stretched for miles. Wastelands filled with death, forests where danger lurked at every shadow, swamps and lakes where things older than men dwelled.

It wasn't just a war between men; it was a war between men and beasts.

Hulking creatures that oozed bloodlust, spindly beings of bony limbs that crawled out of nightmares, shapeless monsters that defied all description.

Joshua had grown used to the sights of the dead and the dying. It was his job as a medic-in-training to experience all these terrible things in hopes of saving a life. He cursed his weakness for staying at the rear, feeling like a coward when others risked their lives to drive back the darkness, venturing between the mortar and darkness, to fight with blade and gun against the depraved and the monstrous.

The sick and wounded would look upon these men and women trying to save them and see angels.

At his nineteen years of age, Joshua already knew there were no angels here, not in the front.

Except for one.

Eyes like red jewels, a soft shade of pink hair bordering on silver tied into a long braid that looped over, pale skin like porcelain. Without blemish, pure and radiant despite all the dirt, the grim and the mud around her. Her sharply colored uniform shone like a beacon amidst all the grey and scorched earth. The bright red, button-up jacket, decorated with all the commendations and awards granted to her for her service, struggled to contain her outstanding bosom and staggering musculature. Her gray pants stuck to her muscular legs like a second skin, highlighting every part of her wide quads, while her high boots constrained around the bulging calves.

A sight that inspired hope and relief, the Angel of Steel, the Nightingale.

His mother.

The woman's steely gaze did not waver for a moment; she saw her duty before her and sprang into action.

The broken wreckage of a tank sank into the mud, but she grabbed the piece of machinery and slowly hoisted it over her head. Her jacket strained as her lats flared out like wings, her back muscles widening as her biceps bloomed imperiously. Her superhuman strength used not just for fighting, but to save lives.

"Down there," Her firm, almost monotone voice spoke up. "Joshua, quick"

"Yes!" He replied, diving into the mud to pull out the unconscious soldier. His mother held the broken piece of the tank above her until they were in the clear, and then threw it away like garbage.

"Status." She requested.

"Multiple bullet wounds. Shoulder, stomach. A gash on his forehead." He laid the soldier on the ground and began treating him.

"I will look for more wounded," Nightingale said. "Remain here."

"I can help--"

"Your priority is your patient. I will find more to take to safety." Florence said with a light frown that brooked no argument. "Got it?"

“...Understood”

She nodded and took off in a run. He watched as his imposing mother moved through the remnants of the battlefield, through obstacles and wreckage too dense or too heavy for regular humans to move through. But she swatted them away like tiny scraps of garbage, her superhuman strength letting her retrieve three wounded soldiers at once.

Such a glorious sight she was. His greatest inspiration. The source of his hope in this bleak war.

He could never be like her, but took solace in knowing that despite it all, he was still her companion, her trusted aide. He was more than her son; he was her closest confidant. There was nobody closer to the Angel of Steel than him.

But that illusion would shatter away one fateful day... when she took in that young man into their home...

X~X~X~X~X

Theirs was a simple life, with their house located far enough from the front lines to be safe but close enough that they could spring into action whenever they were needed. Their house was rustic, but it did not lack for necessities like running water. Wood and game were plentiful, he was good with a rifle to hunt down a deer. And his mother could easily split wood with a swing of her axe, then lift the entire trunk over her massive shoulder with just one powerful arm. It was quite a sight to see her out of uniform, dressed like a frontier woman. Her bulging physique stretched the flannel and jeans...

Joshua was not blind to his mother's beauty. The stern, often neutral expression, did little to mask her lovely visage. And when she smiled, that's when all the warmth and care that lay deep inside her truly shone. The Nurse of Steel fought to save lives, for she truly cared about others above all else.

And there was another key component to her beauty that Joshua could not ignore: her outstanding iron-like frame. Her bulging muscles were world-class, with arms as thick as cannon balls, easily as big as his own head, legs that could crush a steel beam between their overwhelming thickness and power.

She trained with such diligence, such superhuman rigor, that she had become absolutely goddess-like in her visage and might. A true amazon of modern times. Yet his mother treated it like another tool in her arsenal, just another asset to let her perform her duty properly.

Joshua wished he could have inherited her superhuman physique, but he was too ordinary compared to her. He took after his father, she would say. She did not talk about him much, and he would not press.

Even if he could not train on the same level as her, he still supported his mother as much as he could. Helping her prepare meals, develop better nutrients, and, of course, research medicine and new medical procedures for the front lines.

But helping her train, watching her body flex and ripple, a thin sheet of sweat coating her toned, veiny visage...

He lost count of the times he saw the biceps swell imperiously as they lifted those titanic weights designed to test her superior strength. How the flesh wobbled under the skin, making the etched definition deepen with each repetition. Power rising in her chest as the movement of her arms carried ripples all the way to the corners of her pecs. How her stomach tightened with each deep breath and made her strained, jutting abdominals flex.

The way she bent over when picking up a large bar made the hamstrings pop like corded cables while her derriere tightened impressively into a blend of muscular tone and softness. To say nothing of the way her thighs bulged so outrageously.

Yes, Joshua was quite aware that his admiration for his mother had long since crossed a threshold of what was considered acceptable. Particularly once he matured and started having dreams that would result in him waking up erect, needing to relieve himself in the privacy of his bathroom.

But it was fine, he could live with it. He could live with keeping this side of him hidden. He was the son of the Iron Angel, the Nurse of Steel. So long as he could marvel at her physique closely, getting a touch once in a while as he helped towel her off or measure her progress, or better yet, when she taught him anatomy using herself as a model, then he was quite happy.

He was her apprentice and her assistant; what more could he want from life?

It wasn't until he arrived that he felt those precious things were taken from him.

A young soldier about his age named Gudao had all but dropped into their doorstep. Wounded from battle, away from the front lines. Nightingale was swift to treat him, granting him shelter under their roof as she helped him recover in a spare bedroom.

From the first day, he felt something off. The way his gaze lingered on his mother, how he snapped to attention as her muscles twitched even slightly. That longing gaze, the dry lips...

It was like staring into a mirror.

And worst of all, his mother seemed to pay more attention than necessary to her patient.

The way her gaze softened and smiled softened in that way should only be reserved for him.

Joshua did not like it all.

But he was his mother's son; he upheld her beliefs. A patient's well-being was paramount. Of course, he wanted him recovered as fast as possible to get him out of the house, so it'd be the two of them once more.

"His recovery is coming along smoothly," Joshua said casually as he served the boiled vegetables onto a plate. "It is impressive, considering the state we found him in."

"Indeed." His large mother replied. "He made it all the way from a battle to our home after all, that alone shows he is quite resilient." She grabbed the plate he had just finished serving and placed it on a tray.

"Yes..." He did not like how he unintentionally praised Gudao. "How long do you think until he is good to go?"

"Will require a few more days of rest." She said, pouring water into a cup and then placing it on the tray too. "I'll bring him his meal."

"Oh, I can do it for you," He said, a touch too quickly. "You've been working so much, please just take it easy. Enjoy your lunch."

"It's fine," She smiled softly at him, carrying the tray. "I want to do this."

'Want to do this' ... another phrase that did not sit well with him.

He waited until his mother was out of view to stab a knife into the table, venting his frustrations upon the furniture.

All the check-ups, all the conversations between his mother and the soldier... Just what was the deal with this man that had her mother tending to him so? He should be just another patient.

Strange things were going on. He was certain he heard his mother moving around the house late at night.

And today, he found something strange. A broken piece of fabric was just randomly on the floor. A quick search through the garbage led him to find even more torn articles of clothing, buried under all the refuse. All of them looked like they came from his mother's clothes...

He needed answers.

X~X~X~X~X

Night time, the house was dark and quiet. All the occupants were sleeping in their beds.

At least, they should be. Joshua certainly wasn't, and he knew for a fact his mother wasn't in bed either. He stayed awake, waiting as he heard her heavy steps over the wooden floor when she walked by the hall. Try as she might, it was hard to be stealthy with a bulk like hers, so she was likely counting on the fact that he was sleeping.

To go to the guest room.

To Gudao...

The thought made his blood boil; jealousy steamed inside him. He just knew something was going on there. He needed to get to the bottom of this.

Silently tiptoeing his way to the guest room, he leaned closer to the door but could only hear muffled voices. There was no way he could open the door and peek in without them noticing.

Which was why he had made preparations beforehand.

The guest room was next to the broom closet. Earlier today, Joshua had loosened one of the wooden plates on the wall and drilled a hole to see through into the other room, covering it with the same bar to hide his tracks.

He just needed to move a few things out of the way and carefully remove the wooden plate without making any noise. And presto; He had a good view of the guest room.

Joshua leaned closer, peering into the makeshift eyehole... and felt something in him break.

Inside the guest room was his mother, with the young soldier.

The two were embracing.

And kissing.

Kissing loudly. Desperately. Their lips smacked against each other with muffled moans coming from the two.

Gudao placed his hands over her enormous shoulders, tugging at the shirt and slipping a few fingers inside to feel her deltoids and biceps. The Nightingale held him close, pressing his smaller frame against her imposing muscles, smooshing her ample breasts against his chest.

He had never seen his mother like this before... The image of the unshakable Steel Nurse did not mesh with the sight of her engaging in such passionate activities, and yet here she was. Enjoying herself fully.

With someone else... another man got to enjoy the muscles he adored so much without any restriction.

"You're so beautiful," He muttered huskily. "Your muscles are... perfect."

"They're just... the product of hard labor. And a strict regime." It was odd to hear his mother, the woman who could lift tanks, sound so breathless.

"They're more than that." He grasped her arms, much to Joshua's jealousy. "They're a symbol of how strong you are. How much you believe in your cause... that makes them all the more beautiful, makes you even more amazing."

Those red eyes that would only ignite when performing her duty suddenly came alive. There was a new fire in them, a passion of the lights Joshua had never seen in her before.

She unentangled from their embrace and took a step back. Part of him hoped she'd just leave. But it was a fool's hope.

What happened next, however, more than made up for it.

She took a deep breath, then another, and another. Her chest heaved, and her thorax inflated each time she did so. Her knuckles popped as she clenched her fists so tightly that her arms were shaking.

Then Joshua saw something wonderful.

She brought up her arms and flexed; the action caused her sleeves to instantly tear. Ripping at the seams as shoulders popped out, lats flaring out through the torn threads, the fabric unraveling around her bulging biceps.

Her ample breasts split the shirt down the middle, revealing her sweat bosom and ripped pectorals. Her shredded abdominals soon unveiled as the rest of the shirt quickly disintegrated.

Joshua experienced the hardest erection of his life as he stared at his mother's muscular, naked torso. He marveled at the outstanding definition etched into the valleys of her flesh, licking his lips as he deeply desired to satiate his need to taste those bulging muscles with his tongue.

She was not done, however; she put one foot forward and snapped a flex so fast the pants barely had time to register their destruction, as the jean fabric was utterly torn asunder by the sudden rise of her wide quad and rippling calf. She followed suit with the other leg, and soon all that remained were those very tight and moist panties.

“...You want to admire my body?” She muttered to Gudao, who also sported a raging hard-on. “Then bask”

It should have been him. It should have been him there, feeling those muscles, kissing them, tasting them. He had spent so much time with them, helping her progress, learning from her anatomy. He had the right. And yet it wasn't him who was living the ultimate fantasy, it was someone else.

Worse still, he couldn't stop masturbating even as he watched. Such was the hold his mother's body had on him.

Then, when she pushed Gudao onto the bed, she ripped her panties with a simple tug, revealing her wet sex. She climbed the bed, kneeling over him as her entrance hovered above his waist, right above his manhood...

In that moment, as she descended and impaled herself on it, Joshua pictured himself in the soldier's stead and shot his load against the wall.

X~X~X~X~X

Gudao leaving should have been met with elation (secretly, of course) from him. But he couldn't erase the memories of that night, the way his mother brandished her body not as the tool she said it was for so long, but in a sensual and liberated manner, engaging in all manner of sexual activities with the soldier who grasped and worshipped her enormity. The way she moaned, grunted, laughed in joy, her facial expression displaying emotions Joshua had never seen in his mother before.

Feelings he perhaps had dreamt of bringing out himself one day.

But he couldn't. Because he wasn't that man. That soldier who was his same age, and yet had something he didn't. Something that allowed his mother to finally come loose and indulge in the beauty of his muscles...

The two waved as Gudao walked away down the road, slowly disappearing from view, his backpack full of his gear, ready to return to the battlefield.

"There goes our guest." He said, trying to sound as casual as possible.

"He's a soldier; he was never going to stay long."

Try as you might, mother. He thought to himself. I can hear the disappointment...

"He's a brave young man who'll accomplish much." She said, returning to the house. "We did our duty saving him."

...So that was it, huh? Joshua realized in a moment of manic epiphany. That's why her mother had been so taken with him. The truth was that deep down, this was the kind of man her mother desired. No, needed. A warrior, strong, brave. Someone who would put his life on the line. Like the kind she dedicated her life to saving, the kind of men she had the utmost respect for.

Of course, only that sort of man could inspire fiery passion in her. Only a soldier, a warrior, could make her feel lust and desire.

If that's what her mother craved, then that's what he'd give her.

In the old days, women would be presented with gifts in the form of slain animals. Men would prove their masculinity and prowess by hunting fierce beasts, presenting their remains to their chosen women to prove their valor.

Nowadays, trophies only served to exalt the warrior's own pride and accomplishments. He'd seen heads of beasts mounted on plaques above chimneys. He knew what to look for. Something to prove to his mother that though he was not big and strong like her, he was a warrior all the same, not just a medic.

He walked through the woods on a snowy afternoon, picking up a trail with his trusted rifle in his hand. The footprints were large, a bear. Yes, that would make a fine trophy.

Joshua silently moved through the snow and trees, keeping an eye open for the beast to appear at any moment. He stopped when he spotted movement amidst the foliage. There it was, his prey.

The bear slowly came into view. And just as Joshua aimed with his rifle, he froze.

The creature had a bloody snout, fangs too long for a bear. Its size was too large for a bear of these parts, too; its fur was too dark to be a brown bear. Its legs too long and spindly.

And there were... spikes coming out of its back.

Oh god, this wasn't a regular bear. It was a monster from the frontiers. A creature born not by the laws of nature, but the madness of men with their science and alchemy. A type of war beast to be unleashed on the battlefield, a living killing machine that knew no other instinct other than blood and death.

He couldn't kill this.

Joshua slowly turned around, careful not to be seen or heard. He'd have to inform his mother that an altered beast was around the area, and bring a proper squad to hunt it down.

He just needed to get far away so he could-

Snap.

A twig broke under his foot.

The monster's head snapped in his direction.

Joshua gulped.

The monstrous bear roared and charged. And Joshua ran.

It was futile; he was never going to outrun a bear. Much less an alchemical monstrosity of one.

The beast impacted him with its full weight, sending him flying against a tree, where he painfully collided. The world became blurry, the sounds muffled, he briefly saw the creature coming towards him, ready to devour him with those long, sick-looking fangs.

And then a large figure, clad in red, punched it so hard the creature actually staggered back.

The last thing he perceived was his mother growling with far more anger than he had ever heard before as she began grappling with the monster.